Poetry.

Soldier's Farewell to his Musket.
Old comrade mine these long years through Unlike most friendships pass away,
Your aim I found was always true—
My musket.
How strange we were when first we met,
I'm sure I never shall forget,
Old times and scenes—I see them yet!
My musket.
When each we understood,
Your line and stock I found were good;
And play me false you never would—
My musket.
I found you rough and quite uncouth;
You're polished now, and bright and smooth,
And when you spoke 'twas for the truth—
My musket.
How straight we looked then in the eye,
When first we met to do or die!
In battle, under Freedom's sky!
My musket.
Ah! who could then our feelings tell,
When first your fire the foe men fell;
'Twas then you did your duty well,
My musket.
Good-bye! "Old comrade," you've got to go—
I'm sad to part, I love you so!
I'll keep you, but "E. S." says "No!"
My musket.

Miscellaneous.

The President's Message.
Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

To express gratitude to God, in the name of the People, for the preservation of the Union, is my first duty in addressing you. Our next thoughts revert to the death of the late President by an act of perfidious treason. The grief of the nation is still fresh; it finds some solace in the consideration that he lived to enjoy the highest proof of his confidence by entering on the renewed term of the Chief Magistracy, to which he had been elected; that he brought the civil war substantially to a close; that his loss was deplored in all parts of the Union; and that foreign nations have rendered justice to his memory. His removal cast upon me a heavier weight of cares than ever devolved upon any one of his predecessors. To fulfill my trust I need the support of all who are associated with me in the various departments of Government, and the support and confidence of the people. There is but one way in which I can hope to gain this necessary aid; it is, to state with frankness the principles which guide my conduct, and their application to the present state of affairs, well aware that the efficiency of my labors will, in a great measure, depend on your and their individual approbation.

The Union of the United States of America was intended by its authors, to last as long as the States themselves shall last. "The Union shall be perpetual" are the words of the Declaration of Independence. The form of a more perfect Union, by an ordinance of the people of the United States, is the declared purpose of the Constitution. The band of Divine Providence was never more plainly visible in the affairs of men than in the framing and the adoption of that instrument. It is, beyond comparison, the greatest event in American history; and indeed it is not of all events in modern times, the most pregnant with consequences for every people of the earth? The members of the Convention which prepared it, brought to their work the experience of the Confederation of their several States, and of other Republican Governments, old and new; but they needed and they obtained a wisdom superior to experience. And when for its validity it required the approval of a people that occupied a large part of a continent and acted separately in many distinct conventions, what is more wonderful than that, after earnest contention and long discussion, all opinions were ultimately drawn in one way to its support?

The Constitution to which life was thus imparted contains within itself ample resources for its own preservation. It has power to enforce the laws, punish treason, and ensure domestic tranquillity. In case of the usurpation of the Government of a State by one man, or an oligarchy, it becomes a duty of the United States to make good the guarantee to that State of a republican form of government, and to maintain the homogeneity of all. Does the lapse of time reveal defects? A simple mode of amendment is provided in the constitution itself, so that its conditions can always be made to conform to the requirements of advancing civilization. No room is allowed even for the thought of a possibility of its coming to an end. And these powers of self-preservation, have always been asserted in their complete integrity by every patriot in Chief Magistracy—by Jefferson and Jackson, not less than by Washington and Madison. The parting advice of the Father of his Country, while yet President, to the people of the United States, was, that "the free Constitution, which was the work of their hands, might be sacredly maintained; and the inaugural words of President Jefferson held up the preservation of the General Government, in its constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad." The Constitution is the work of "the People of the United States," and it should be indestructible as the people.

It is not strange that the framers of the Constitution, which had no model in the past, should not have fully comprehended the excellence of their own work. Fresh from a struggle against arbitrary power, many patriots suffered from harassing fears of an absorption of the State Governments by the General Government, and many from a dread that the States would break away from their orbit. But the very greatness of the country should allay the apprehension of encroachments by the General Government. The subjects that come unquestionably within its jurisdiction are so numerous, that it must ever naturally refuse to be embarrassed by questions that lie beyond it. Were it otherwise, the Executive would sink beneath the burden; the channels of justice would be choked; legislation would be obstructed by excess; so that there is a greater temptation to exercise some of the functions of the General Government through the States than to trespass on their rights. The "absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority" was enfolded at the beginning of the century by Jefferson as the vital principle of republicanism, and the events of the last forty years have established, we will hope forever, that there lies no appeal to force.

The maintenance of the Union brings it the support of the State Governments in all their rights; but it is not one of the rights of any State Government to renounce its own place in the Union, or to nullify the laws of the Union. The largest liberty is to be maintained in the discussion of the acts of the Federal Government; but there is no appeal from its laws, except to the various branches of that Government itself, or to the people, who grant to the members of the Legislative and of the Executive Departments no tenure but a limited one, and in that manner always retain the powers of redress.

"The sovereignty of the States" is the language of the Confederacy; and not the language of the Constitution. The latter contains the emphatic words: "The Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Certainly the Government of the United States is a limited government; and so is every State government a limited government. With the idea of limitation spreads through every form of administration, general, State, and municipal, and rests on the great distinguishing principle of the rights of man. The ancient republics absorbed the individual in the State, prescribed his religion, and controlled his activity. The American system rests on the assertion of the equal right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; to freedom of conscience, to the culture and exercise of all his faculties. As a consequence, the State Government is limited, as to the General Government in the interest of the Union, as to the individual citizen in the interest of freedom.

States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the Constitution of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the Powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by the States; so also were the Articles of Confederation; and when "the people of the United States" ordained and established the Constitution, it was by the assent of the States, one by one, which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the Constitution, the proposition of Congress needs the confirmation of the States. Without States, one great branch of the legislative government would be wanting. And, if we look beyond the letter of the Constitution to the character of our country, its capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire, its security for the perpetual existence of the States as "supreme authority" of the constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the constitution being with it the perpetuity of the States; their mutual relation makes us what we are, and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures, the States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other.

I have thus explained my views on the mutual relations of the Constitution and the States, because they unfold the principles upon which I have sought to solve the momentous questions and overcome the appalling difficulties that met me at the very commencement of my administration. It has been my steadfast object to escape from the sway of momentary passions, and to derive a healing policy from the fundamental and unchanging principles of the Constitution.

I found the States suffering from the effects of a civil war. Resistance to the General Government appeared to have exhausted itself. The United States had recovered possession of their forts and arsenals; and their armies were in the occupation of every State which had attempted to secede. Whether the territory within the limits of these States should be held as conquered territory, under the military authority emanating from the President as the head of the army, was the first question that presented itself for decision.

Now, military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of dissent; would have divided the people into the vanquishers and the vanquished; and would have envenomed hatred, rather than have restored affection. Once established, no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration from and to that portion of the country is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony; and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home, would place himself willingly under military rule? The chief persons who would have followed in the train of the army would have been dependents on the General Government, or men who expected profit from the miseries of their fellow-citizens. The powers of patronage and rule which would have been exercised, under the President, over a vast, and populous, and naturally wealthy region, are greater than, unless under extreme necessity, I should be willing to entrust to any one man; they are such as, for myself, I could never, unless on occasions of great emergency, consent to exercise. The wilful use of such powers, if continued through a period of years, would have endangered the purity of the general administration and the liberties of the States which remained loyal.

Besides, the policy of military rule over a conquered territory would have implied that the States whose inhabitants may have taken part in the rebellion, had, by the act of those inhabitants ceased to exist. But the true theory is, that all pretended acts of secession were, from the beginning null and void. The State, cannot commit treason, nor screen the individual citizens who may have committed treason, any more than they can make valid treaties or engage in lawful commerce with any foreign Power. The States attempting to secede placed themselves in a condition where their vitality was impaired, but not extinguished—their functions suspended, but not destroyed.

But if any State neglects or refuses to perform its duties, there is the more need that the General Government should maintain all its authority, and as soon as practicable, resume the exercise of its functions. On this principle I have acted, and have gradually and quietly, by almost imperceptible steps, sought to restore the rightful energy of the General Government and of the States. To that end, Provisional Governors have been appointed for the States, Conventions called, Governors elected, Legislatures assembled, and Senators and Representatives chosen to the Congress of the United States. At the same time, the Courts of the United States, as far as could be done, have been re-opened, so that the laws of the United States may be enforced through their agency. The blockade has been removed, and the customhouse re-established in ports of entry, so that the revenue of the United States may be collected. The Post Office Department renews its ceaseless activity, and the General Government is thereby enabled to communicate promptly with officers and agents. The courts bring security to persons and property; the opening of the ports invites the restoration of industry and commerce; the post office renews the facilities of social intercourse and of business. And it is not happy for us all that the restoration of each one of these functions of the General Government brings with it a blessing to the States over which they are extended? Is it not a sure promise of harmony and renewed attachment to the Union that, after all that has happened, the return of the General Government is known only as a beneficence?

I know very well that this policy is attended with some risk; that for its success it requires at least the acquiescence of the States which it concerns; that it implies an invitation to those States, by renewing their allegiance to the United States, to resume their functions as States of the Union. But it is a risk that must be taken in the choice of difficulties, it is the smallest risk; and to diminish, if it is possible, to remove all danger I have felt it incumbent on me to assert one other power of the General Government—the power to pardon. As no State can throw a defense over the crime of treason, the power of pardon is exclusively vested in the Executive Government of the United States. In exercising that power, I have taken every precaution to connect it with the clearest recognition of the binding force of the laws of the United States, and an unqualified acknowledgment of the great social change of condition in regard to slavery which has grown out of the war.

The next step which I have taken to restore the constitutional relations of the States, has been an invitation to them to participate in the high office of amending the Constitution. Every patriot must wish for a general amnesty at the earliest epoch consistent with public safety. For this great end there is need of a concurrence of all opinions, and the spirit of mutual condonation. All parties in the late rebellion must work together in harmony. It is not too much to ask, in the name of the whole people, that, on one side, the plan of restoration shall proceed in conformity with a willingness to exist the disorders of the past into oblivion; and that, on the other, the evidence of slavery in the future maintenance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which provides for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of our country. So long as the adoption of this amendment is delayed, so long will doubt, and jealousy, and uncertainty prevail. This is the measure which will effect the sad memory of the past; this is the measure which will most certainly call for union, and capital, and security to those parts of the Union that need them most. Indeed, it is not too much to ask of the States which are now resuming their places in the family of the Union, to give this pledge of perpetual loyalty to the United States. Until it is done, the past, however much we may desire it, will not be forgotten. The adoption of the amendment reunites us beyond all power of disruption. It heals the wound that is still imperfectly closed; it removes slavery, the element which has so long perplexed and divided the country; it makes of us once more a united people, renewed and strengthened, bound more than ever to mutual affection and support.

The amendment to the Constitution being adopted, it would remain for the States, whose powers have been so long in abeyance, to resume their places in the two branches of the National Legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration. Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, and qualifications of your own members.

The full assertion of the powers of the General Government requires the holding of Circuit Courts of the United States within the district where their authority has been interrupted. In the present posture of our public affairs, strong objections have been urged to holding those courts in any of the States where rebellion has existed; and it was ascertained by inquiry, that the Circuit Court of the United States would not be held within the District of Virginia during the autumn or early winter, nor until Congress should have "an opportunity, to consider and act on the whole subject." To your deliberations the restoration of the branch of the civil authority of the United States is therefore necessarily referred, with the hope that early provision will be made for the resumption of all its functions. It is manifest that treason most flagrant in character, has been committed. Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country, in order that the Constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated; the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished and the offenses made infamous; and, at the same time, that the question may be judicially settled, finally and forever, that no State of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union.

The relations of the General Government towards the four millions of inhabitants whom the war has called into freedom, have engaged my most serious consideration. On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors by the proclamation of the Executive, I took for my counsel the Constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When the first movement towards independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise. During the period of the Confederacy, there continued to exist a very great diversity in the qualifications of electors in the several States; and even within a State, a distinction of qualifications prevailed with regard to the officers who were to be chosen. The Constitution of the United States recognizes these diversities when it enjoins that, in the choice of Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." After the formation of the Constitution, it remained, as before, the uniform usage for each State to enlarge the body of its electors, according to its own judgment; and, under this system, one State after another has proceeded to increase the number of its electors, until now universal suffrage, or something very near it, is the general rule. So fixed was this reservation of power in the habits of the people, and so unquestioned has been the interpretation of the Constitution, that during the civil war the late President never harbored the purpose of disregarding it; and in the acts of Congress during that period, nothing can be found which, during the continuance of hostilities, much less after their close, would have sanctioned any departure by the Executive from a policy which has so uniformly obtained. Moreover, a concession of the elective franchise to the freedmen, must have been extended to all colored men, wherever found, and so must have established a change of suffrage in the Northern, Middle, and Western States, not less than in the Southern and Southwestern. Such an act would have created a new class of voters, and would have been an assumption of power by the President which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted.

On the other hand, every danger of conflict is avoided when the settlement of the question is referred to the several States. They can, each for itself, decide on the measure, and whether it is to be adopted at once and absolutely, or introduced gradually and with conditions. In my judgment, the freedmen, if they show patience and many virtues will so not obtain a participation in the elective franchise through the States than through the General Government, even if it had power to intervene. When the tumult of emotions that have been raised by the suddenness of the social change shall have subsided, it may prove that they will receive the kindest usage from some of those on whom they have heretofore most closely depended.

But while I have no doubt that now after the close of the war, it is not content for the General Government to extend the elective franchise in the several States, it is equally clear that good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife. We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two peoples to live side by side, in a state of mutual benefit and good will.—The experiment involves us in no inconsistency; let us then, go on and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened.—The country is in need of labor, and the freedmen are in need of employment, culture and protection. While their right of voluntary migration and expatriation is not to be questioned, I would not advise their forced removal and colonization. Let us rather encourage them to honorable and useful industry, where it may be beneficial to themselves and to the country; and, instead of hasty anticipations of the certainty of failure, let there be nothing wanting to the fair trial of the experiment. The change in their condition is the substitution of labor by contract for the status of slavery. The freedmen cannot fairly be accused of unwillingness to work, so long as a doubt remains about his freedom of choice in his pursuits, and the certainty of his recovering his stipulated wages. In this the interests of the employer and the employed coincide. The employer desires in his workmen spirit and alacrity, and no other can be permanently secured in any way. And if the one ought to be able to enforce the contract so ought the other. The public interest will be best promoted, if the several States will provide adequate protection and remedies for the freedmen. Until this is in some way accomplished, there is no chance for the advantageous use of their labor; and the blame of ill-success will not rest on them.

I know that sincere philanthropy is earnest for the immediate realization of its remotest aims; but time is always an element in reform. It is one of the greatest acts on record to have brought four millions of people into freedom. The career of free industry must be fairly opened to them; and then their future prosperity and condition must, after all, rest mainly on themselves. If they fail, and so perish away, let us be careful that the failure shall not be attributable to any denial of justice. In all that relates to the destiny of the freedmen, we need not be too anxious to read the future; many incidents which, from a speculative point of view, might raise alarm, will quietly settle themselves.

Now that slavery is at an end or near its end, the greatness of its evil, in the point of view of public economy, becomes more and more apparent. Slavery was essentially a monopoly of labor, and as such locked the States where it prevailed against the incoming of free industry.—Where labor was the property of the capitalist, the white man was excluded from employment, or had but the second best chance of finding it; and the foreign emigrant turned away from the region where the condition would be so precarious. With the destruction of the monopoly, free labor will hasten from all parts of the civilized world to assist in developing various and immeasurable resources which have hitherto lain dormant. The eight or nine States nearest the Gulf of Mexico have a soil of exuberant fertility, a climate friendly to long life, and can sustain a denser population than is found as yet in any part of our country. And the future influx of population to them will be mainly from the North, or from the most cultivated nations in Europe. From the sufferings that have attended them during our late struggle, let us look away to the future, which is sure to be laden for them with greater prosperity than has ever before been known. The removal of the monopoly of slave labor is a pledge that those regions will be peopled by a numerous and enterprising population, which will vie with any in the Union in compactness, inventive genius, wealth and industry.

Our Government springs from and was made for the people—not the people for the Government. To them it owes allegiance, strength and wisdom. But while the Government is thus bound to defer to the people, from whom it derives its existence, it should, from the very consideration of its origin, be strong in its powers of resistance to the establishment of inequalities. Monopolies, perpetuities, and class legislation, are contrary to the genius of free government, and ought not to be allowed. Here, there is no room for favored classes or monopolies; the principle of our Government is that of equal laws and freedom of industry. Wherever monopoly attains a foothold, it is sure to be a source of danger, discord, and trouble. We shall but fulfill our duties as legislators by according "equal and exact justice to all men," special privileges to none. The Government is subordinate to the people; but, as the agent and representative of the people, it must be held superior to monopolies, which, in themselves, ought never to be granted, and which, where they exist, must be subordinate and yield to the Government.

The Constitution confers on Congress the right to regulate commerce among the several States. It is of the first necessity, for the maintenance of the Union, that that commerce should be free and unobstructed. No State can be justified in any device to tax the transit of travel and commerce between States. The position of many States is such that, if they were allowed to take advantage of it for purposes of local revenue, the commerce of States might be injuriously burdened, or even virtually prohibited. It is best, while the country is still young, and while the tendency to dangerous monopolies of this kind is still feeble, to use the power of Congress so as to prevent any selfish impediment to the free circulation of men and merchandise. A tax on travel and merchandise, in their transit, constitutes one of the worst forms of monopoly, and the evil is increased if coupled with a denial of the choice of route. When the vast extent of our country is considered, it is plain that every obstacle to the free circulation of commerce between the States ought to be sternly guarded against by appropriate legislation, within the limits of the Constitution.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior explains the condition of the public land, the progress made in the construction of the Pacific railroad, and furnishes information in reference to matters of local interest in the District of Columbia. It also presents evidence of the successful operation of the Homestead Act, under the provisions of which 1,160,538 acres of the public lands were entered during the last fiscal year—more than one fourth of the total number of acres sold, or otherwise disposed of during that period. It is estimated that the receipts derived from this source are sufficient to cover the expenses incident to the survey and disposal of the lands entered under this Act, and that payments in cash to the extent of from 40 to 50 per cent, will be made by settlers, who may thus at any time acquire title before the expiration of the period at which it would otherwise vest. The homestead policy was established only after long and earnest resistance; experience proves its wisdom. The lands, in the hands of industrious settlers whose labor creates wealth and contributes to the public resources, are worth more to the United States than if they had been reserved as a solitude for future purchasers.

The lamentable events of the last four years, and the sacrifices made by the gallant men of our Army and Navy, have swelled the records of the Pension Bureau to an unprecedented extent. On the 30th day of June last, the total number of pensioners was 85,986, requiring for their annual pay, exclusive of expenses, the sum of $8,023,445. The number of applications that have been allowed since that date will require a large increase of this amount for the next fiscal year. The means for the payment of the stipends duo, under existing laws, to our disabled soldiers and sailors, and to the families of such as have perished in the service of the country, will no doubt be cheerfully and promptly granted. A grateful people will not hesitate to sanction any measures having for their object the relief of soldiers' families and families made fatherless in the efforts to preserve our national existence.

The report of the Postmaster General presents an encouraging exhibit of the operations of the Post Office Department during the year. The revenues of the past year from the loyal States alone exceeded the maximum annual receipts from all the States previous to the rebellion, in the sum of $6,038,091; and the annual average increase of revenue during the last four years, compared with the revenues of the four years immediately preceding the rebellion, was $3,533,845. The revenues of the last fiscal year amounted to $14,556,158, and the expenditures to $13,694,728, leaving a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $861,430. Progress has been made in restoring the postal service in the Southern States. The views presented by the Postmaster General against the policy of granting subsidies to ocean mail steamship lines upon established routes, and in favor of continuing the present system, which limits the compensation for ocean service to the to two earnings, are recommended to the careful consideration of Congress.

It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, that while, at the commencement of the present year, there were in commission 530 vessels of all classes and descriptions, armed with 3000 guns and manned by 51,000 men, the number of vessels at present in commission is 217, with 830 guns and 12,138 men. By this prompt reduction of the naval forces the expenses of the Government have been largely diminished, and a number of vessels, purchased for naval purposes from the merchant marine, have been returned to the peaceful pursuits of commerce. Since the suppression of active hostilities our foreign squadrons have been re-established, and consist of vessels much more efficient than those employed on similar service previous to the rebellion. The suggestion for the enlargement of the navy yards, and especially for the establishment of one in fresh water for iron-clad vessels, is deserving of consideration, as is also the recommendation for a different location and more ample grounds for the Naval Academy.

In the report of the Secretary of War, a general summary is given of the military campaigns of 1864 and 1865, ending in the suppression of armed resistance to the national authority in the insurgent States. The operations of the general administrative Bureaus of the War Department during the past year are detailed, and an estimate made of the appropriations that will be required for military purposes in the fiscal year commencing the 30th day of June, 1866. The national military force on the 1st of May, 1865, numbered 1,000,516 men. It is proposed to reduce the military establishment to a peace footing, comprehending fifty thousand troops of all arms, organized so as to admit of an enlargement by filling up the ranks to eighty thousand six hundred, if the circumstances of the country should require an augmentation of the army.—The volunteer force had already been reduced by discharge from service of over eight hundred thousand men, and the Department is proceeding rapidly in the work of further reduction. The war estimates are reduced from $516,240,131 to $38,814,401, which amount, in the opinion of the Department, is adequate for a peace establishment. The measures of retrenchment in each Bureau and branch of the service exhibit a diligent economy worthy of commendation. Reference is also made in the report to the necessity of providing for a uniform military system, and the propriety of making suitable provision for wounded and disabled officers and soldiers.

EAST TRENTON, Dec. 5th, 1863

Having noticed several accounts in exchanges of the amount of cloth worn by ladies, I thought it would not be wholly interesting to your readers to hear of one of the "veteran" ladies in East Trenton.

Mrs. Isabella Whittaker, 71 years old, has worn 200 yards of cloth this summer, besides doing all the house work for her mill. Mrs. Polly Young, 68 years old, has worn upwards of 325 yards, and spun at least 70 skeins of yarn, besides assisting in performing the household duties. Trenton can't be beat.

MEMOR. ACADEMY.—This ancient institution closed the Fall term Nov. 15th. The number of students for the term was 22. Of these 20 are fitting for College, 1 quite as large a number are now teachers. These students represented 40 towns in the State. The Principal was presented to the scholars at the close of the school a complete set of Irving's works, 22 volumes, and the Preceptor with a copy Webster's Quarto Dictionary, with some volumes of poems.

During the past four years 25 students were prepared for College at this Academy. To give these facts, because quite a number of the students are from Hancock County, as is also the accomplished Preceptor.

—Launched, in Orland, Dec. 2d., a new Brig. named "Charlotte Buck," 280 tons burthen, owned by John A. Buck, Esq., and Capt. Wm. A. Gott, who is to command her. This is a very superior vessel in every respect, as no money or men were spared to make it a superior one in every particular, and she is announced by critical judges. We are able to notice the unusual taste and it exhibited in the building of most al-vessels in this section within the past year. Our friend Buck partakes of this dable ambition.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—Three young men of Franklin, John George D. M. Bunker, aged 21 years, John Bunker, aged 15 years, and Benj. S. Bunker aged 14 years, brothers and sons of Benj. Bunker, were swayed on Thanksgiving day, in Duck pond, in Franklin, about a mile from their home. They were skating on the pond, and the ice gave away, letting them into the water. The oldest and youngest were first to break through, the second one coming on the shore fastening on his skates at the time. He on seeing the accident, and, "if my brothers are gone, I might as well go too," and immediately skated into the water where his brothers were. They like the locust their endeavors to get out, as much as thirty feet. No one was at pond at the time, except a small boy of about seven years old. He ran for assistance, but had to go some way. It was an hour or more before any body reached the pond, and at this time all three were drowned. Their bodies were recovered in short time after reaching the pond.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

—The publishers of The Lady's Friend
reissued a splendid number for January.
The leading story being, "The Forest Gleaner," is a fine thing. The literary editorial is also excellent. For terms &c., see Prospect in last week's American.

NEW MUSIC.—Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, New York, has just published the following pieces of new music:—"Tie me to think of Heaven," a sacred song by H. P. Danks. "Do they Love me as I ever," words by Mrs. M. A. Kilduff, music by Mrs. Parkhurst. "Wait, Little One, Wait," a ballad by Mrs. Parkhurst. "Come to the Window, Love," a serenade by H. P. Danks. "The Nation's Jubilee" by W. H. W.

Godley's Lady's Book for January is very extra number. Marion Harland announces a new story, "Rizzoli's Idols." It will be continued through the year. The celebrated story, Mrs. Washington's, by the late Miss Eliza Leslie, is in its number. Other popular writers contribute papers for this number making it a splendid one. We have only to call attention to this leading magazine, to excite the love for it, of its thousands of readers. We beseech that we club with Godley.—In terms, &c., the reader is referred to advertisement.

—We have received the "Prospect" from the Hancock Press to be published in Newbury, about the first of January, by J. Z. A. Smith. The publisher promises to do well. We hope that the future will prove that the assurances of the Prospect are amply entertained and are well justified. And while there is no necessity for disguising the fact that the "Journal" is regarded as a competing and "zealous" rival to the American, and with backers who will leave no stone unturned to accomplish the task in hand, nevertheless we wish the Publisher well, and earnestly hope that he will seek, so far as he can, only an honest and manly rivalry. We will do to enable us to reciprocate such a feeling, and we make our relations pleasant.
